It's called Clapper, and it's a superbly designed GTK app pitched as a "simple and modern GNOME media player".

VLC is undoubtedly the big cheese in the open source video player scene ? and rightly so: no other player comes close in performance, versatility, reliability, features, and so on.

But VLC isn't the most attractive app, and although there are ways to make VLC look better on Ubuntu it's less effort to switch to a native Linux media player.
