French firm Ordissimo is bringing 'the world's simplest laptop' to the UK, a small family of Linux-based computers aimed at the population of holdouts who find conventional PCs and the online world that comes with it too complex to bother with.

That means older users ? Ordissimo reckons they will be over the age of 50 ? and perhaps the very young, anyone for whom the internet, mainstream software and Windows is 'still a mystery'.

Back to basics computing the Ordissimo way offers users a simple range of applications that have, the company claims, been hugely simplified to reduce the number of mouse clicks necessary to perform basic tasks.
