Just as a meaningless addendum, I actually don't use Firefox itself, but rather Debian Linux's Iceweasel, which is exactly the same, the only difference being the logo. Debian has insanely high standards for what constitutes free, which is in fact laudable but leads to things like this renaming because Firefox's logo isn't as completely free as it could be. It causes a lot of confusion for Debian neophytes in the help forums, that's for sure. I kinda like being an Iceweasel user. Cool name. There's also Icedove (renamed Thunderbird email program) and my favorite, Iceape (renamed SeaMonkey internet suite). Speaking of SeaMonkey, did you know this even existed? Yes, it's still possible to use a full featured internet suite that includes a web browser, email and newsgroups client, and HTML editor all in one package. Pretty cool, and free of course, and maybe even useful for some folks. All of these things are from the aforementioned fine folks at Mozilla, which is what rose out of the ashes of Netscape years ago. I loved Netscape!
